Fallacy of Communists In This Country Set Forth By Writer In Organ of Canadian Labor Group to listen to insults.

There is no magic in organization "per se," any more than in the "manifestoes" which the Communists issue so frequently, as if they were messages from heaven endowed with the power of suddenly converting the workers to a full un derstanding of the need of social revolution. That is to say, organization and education are both necessary processes of social evolution and since neither of these processes can be completed in a day-any more than a youth can accomplish the biological evolution of becoming an adult in a day—they call for the exercise of tact and patiencequalities in which the higrarchy of . the Communist Party of Canada 1 notably deficient and here and rest

Whether in its theoretical expression as a scientific exposition of social development, or in its practical expression as a political party, socialism is a natural product which must pass through the phases of infancy and youth in order to attain a mature development. This is a necessary law of the evolution of anything in the natural or social world. But in other countries as; well as Canada the enthusiasts of new movements have lost sight of that law. In the development of scientific, or fact-founded, socialism notably, enthusiasts in the early stages have affected a clannish; exclusiveness, a superior virtue, as though they possessed a special vision and a monopoly of wisdom giving them the right to treat as her-; etics all who do not see eye to eye with them. This lofty conceit in the case of the Communists is joined with a nebulous romanticism and fanatical fervor which gives to the idea of the social revolution the narrow and incomplete character of an end in itself, and begets the illusion that the social organism can be radically changed in a day or so by a general strike, or a political upheavel of a fraction of the

Fed By Russia

This hope of a transformation of capitalism into socialism by a sudden and violent stroke has been fed by the swift rise of the Dictatorship of the Proletariat in Russia. But it is necessary to recognize that the seizure of political power by the Communist Party in Russia was, owing to the peculiar conditions in that country, an adventure very different from the conquest of political power by organized workers in countries like Canada, possessing political democracy and a large, well - organized and intelligent bourgeois class.

In Russia capitalism was only a small island in an ancient feudil regime. An autocratic gar and landlords for the most part controlled the political power. Russia had not experienced a religious; reformation or bourgeois political revolution. The mass of the people were illiterate and steeped in superstition. The soll month of do When the corrupt czarist regime collapsed Korensky Trepresenting the bourgeois class, attempted to appropriate the political power. But neither capitalists proper, nor small business men and traders, had any real training in political method; quite unlike the capitalists and middle classes of, say, England, who since the business revolution under Cromwell have been exercising political power and who, if sometimes divided by divergent interests, have learned to unite their forces in opif you want anything ary a classified ach

Kerensky Was Weak

The Kerensky government was weak and incompetent because the Russian bourgeoisie lacked unity and political experience; because significant proportion of the total population. The small but well-organized and well-disciplined Communist party overthrew Kerensky and seized the political power. The special circumstances favored the Communists. On the one hand, their slogan "The Land for the Peasants," had an appeal that it could not have in Canada where the who led his blood relatives to war. farmers already own their landsnominally at any rate. On the other while they were on the war path, gions of Germany, were ready to turn their anger against both feudal nobility and the bourgeoisie, be-

The Soviet conquest of political ower constituted a social revoluion in the proper sense of the ord, since it was accompanied by transformation of the economic ation of socialism.

In Russia a dictatorship has been incessary, and in the circumstances would be idle to dispute that it is justification. It does not, however, follow that the Russian expernce must inevitably be duplicated n other countries, in which politial democracy has been long estabthed and in which it is possible for he workers by organizing a party of heir own to secure control of the political power.

Normal Processes

The normal processes of social transformation are evolution and evolution. By evolution, we mean he transformation that takes place from day to day; almost impercepible, but continuous and inevitsole: by revolution we mean the oncluding and critical phase of volution, the culminating phase then the economic foundation, or coperty base, of society being hanged, the whole political, jurilical and ethical superstructure also undergoes a radical transforntion. Rebellion and individual olence may also contribute to hanges in the social cosmos, but hey are not normal processes of ocial physiology, but rather, of soiay nathology disease.

The exhortation of Marx, "Workrs of all Countries. Unite," sharply a contrast with the modern policy f the Communists of sowing seeds of discord where they cannot divide and rule does not envisage a social revolution effected by any magic formula of communism, but rather nomasizes the scientific view that socialism canot be achieved until it becomes a vivid ideal in the minds of the workers by virtue of a clear perception of their class interest and the strength of organization for political action as well as for struggles on the economic field will give them. This is the task of education, aided by organization, and such education and organization nust for a long time to come at any ate have a more practical purpose than the inculcation of a belief in a igid doctrinaire philosophy.
