Up to last night, there was no word of the two Royal Canadian Air Force Fairchild seaplanes which left Jericho Beach, Vancouver, on Saturday for Prince Rupert to join in the search for Renahan under direction of Pilot Eckmann. It was quite evident, however, that they must have been stormbound somewhere down the coast, probably before crossing Queen Charlotte Sound. Weather reports from all coast points indicated very stormy weather with heavy rains and high winds. There was no surprise or alarm at the fact that the Canadian planes had not shown up.

Today marks exactly two weeks since Renahan became missing. Had the party escaped to some island unhurt and been able to remove their rations from the plane, they would easily have been able to survive as they were carrying food enough. There has been plenty of rain to provide them with water Metropole Hall Scene of Affair On even had they landed on a very

Should success soon mark the hunt for Renahan, it is understood that the government planes coming here might proceed to Atlin to institute a new search for Capt. E. A. Burke and two companions to engage in rescue operations for whom Renahan was speeding north when he became lost. Renahan's zeal to get speedily started on the rescue might easily have accounted for his effort to make Ketchikan in Old Scottish friends of Ald, and the dark on the night of October
