The new street lighting system and the elimination of wooden sidewalks were marks of progress. He had not been influenced in the council by any party, group or club. He spoke of the false representations that had been made against the retiring members of the city council. He welcomed the activities of the Ratepayers' Association and would join it. He characterized the criticism that the members of the last council were too harmonious as just an election dodge. There had been no scrapping or swearing at each other.
