UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Undoubtedly some more or less definite form of unemployment insurance must be adopted by Canada in order to meet a condition like that which existed last winter. It does not necessarily have to be along the lines of any insurance scheme already adopted. It must be such as will preserve the independence of the worker and must be effective in preventing women and children from starvation without frequent appeals to charity or to municipal or other government aid.

If Mr. Bennett can draw up a suitable measure that will be satisfactory to the workers and the employers he will be acclaimed a statesman. It is a difficult matter to deal with but must be dealt with soon by some government.

THE NATIONAL POLICY

The Edmonton Bulletin in a recent issue has the following interesting editorial article dealing with the policy of finding markets for Canadian produce:

Hon. Herbert Greenfield says the way to sell more Canadian wheat in Britain is to buy more British goods in Canada. Up until last mid-summer Canadians seemed to be pretty well agreed that international trade worked in that way. Then, seemingly, the voters of the Dominion changed their minds, in a number large enough to put the idea out of court.

The voters then elected a government pledged to shut the products of other countries out of Canada and at the same time force Canadian products into their markets. This policy the government applied last September by raising the tariff against British goods. Whatever is to be said about that action, it was thoroughly in keeping with the platform on which Mr. Bennett asked for power and was given it. No charge of inconsistency lies against the government on that account.

Mr. Greenfield evidently thinks, after four years of residence in Britain, that this is not the way to enlarge the market for Canadian products in that country. A good many Canadians, though presumably a minority of them, think the same. But that is now the policy of Canada, explicitly stated, popularly approved, and already put into effect.

Whether this new national policy is right or wrong—and by all the laws of economics and human nature it is wrong—the unwelcome fact is that if increased sale of Canadian wheat in Britain depends upon increased sale of British goods in Canada being allowed, the prospect of marketing our wheat crop in that quarter is not very good.

Along about June we shall all be able to drive across the new bridge over Galloway Rapids and then we shall be happy once more. One bridge after another is the way we drive through life.
