Prince Rupert Sinking Last Spring Was No Fault of His, Declares Chief Engineer Boyd

VANCOUVER, Aug. 28.—Denial that any fault of his had caused the sinking of the steamer Prince Rupert at Esquimalt last March was voiced by Herbert H. Boyd, former chief engineer, at the marine inquiry into the mishap yesterday.

It was through the insistent demands of Chief Engineer Boyd, who, along with the second engineer, first officer, third officer, two firemen and watchman, was discharged after the accident, that the inquiry has been held.

Captain's Suggestion Suggestion that the Prince Rupert sank while moored at Yarrow's Esquimalt dock on March 6 because a ballast tank was allowed to overflow through a sounding well into the stern of the ship and subsequent settling allowed water to flow into the vessel through open glory-hole ports, was made by Capt. Daniel Donald, master, at an opening of the inquiry.

Capt. Donald was asked to give his theory of what Capt. J. D. Macpherson, Dominion wreck commissioner, described as being "an extraordinary casualty."

Hesitating because he said he could not prove his theory, Capt. Donald, who was not on the ship when she sank, said that Chief Engineer H. H. Boyd had told him that No. 6 tank was being filled the night the ship sank.

Sounding Well Theory

In his testimony he explained that the overflow pipe from the ballast tank emerges on deck, but that a sounding well leads from the interior of the ship. He said that this sounding well has a cock.

The accident happened on a Friday, Capt. Donald testified that he left the ship at 11 a.m. to come to Vancouver for the week-end. After inspecting the ship before leaving he was sure she was in perfectly safe condition as to draught and stability.
