BARRISTER IS HEARD

T. W. Brown Gives Gyro Club Interesting Address on Subject of Criminal Law Administration

"Administration of Criminal Law" was the subject of a highly interesting address delivered before the Prince Rupert Gyro Club at luncheon yesterday by T. W. Brown of the legal firm of Williams, Manson, Brown & Harvey. Mr. Brown defined the nature of summary and indictable trials. The summary trial usually comprised the hearing of more or less minor cases which the police court magistrate was authorized to try. Summary trials were the only ones in which technical defences were to any extent possible.

There were two classes of indictable trials—first, that heard by the County Court judge and, second, that by jury. Jury trial was compulsory in many of the more serious charges such as murder. In the trial by jury, the technical defence was largely eliminated. The jury was the sole judge of the facts and appeals could only be entered on legal grounds such as on the admissibility of evidence, charge of the trial judge etc. At that, appeals against convictions in trials by jury in the great majority of cases failed.

Rights of Accused
Mr. Brown described what he termed the rights of accused persons in Canadian jurisprudence. Under British law an accused did not have to give evidence. Nor could hearsay evidence be used against him. The public generally was under a good deal of misapprehension as far as these rights were concerned. Trial by jury was not an immemorial right nor was it even a British institution. Actually, the principal of trial by jury had been established by the French Normans and had later been adopted by the British. Free speech was also a misnomer. Actually there was no freedom of speech and a person might be thrown into jail for almost any criticism of the government or the King. The so-called "free speech" largely depended upon the sufferance of the government of the day.

Mr. Brown also discussed the matter of a reasonable doubt going in favor of an accused person. This was permitted in Canadian courts because there was no organized crime. Society was stronger than crime and could afford to take the chance of being thus generous with criminals. Much difference was the situation in the United States where there was organized crime which operated like big business.

Declaring his belief that the Canadian system was better than that of the United States although possibly not so much better as many people might believe, Mr. Brown went on to compare the methods of administration of criminal law in Canada and United States. Politics was liable to enter more largely into the American system than the Canadian. In Canada judges were appointed for life and could not be adversely affected by their decisions. In United States the office of judge was elective for periods of two, four or six years. Naturally, the political element was bound to enter into decisions. Much the same was the case so far as the district attorney was concerned. The district attorney in the United States must make a showing of convictions. In Canada the duty of the prosecutor was not so much to obtain convictions but to see that the proper facts were brought out in justice to the public and to the accused person.

The fact that technical defences were permissible in the trials of more serious crimes in the United States was also deterrent to the effective of criminal law administration in that country. These were the most important differences between criminal law administration in Canada and the United States. There were other less important differences.

At the conclusion of his address Mr. Brown was heartily thanked for his address by President C. C. Mills.

The winner of the luncheon raffle was Dr. L. W. Kergin. There was a large attendance of members of the club and Mr. Hooper of Digby Island was a guest.
