GERMAN ELECTIONS

Judging by the first returns in the German elections, Field Marshal Paul von Hindenburg will continue as president. While he failed to secure a majority over all opponents his lead is so great that there is little doubt of his final selection for the important position. Like many opposition parties, it is often over-estimated because of the amount of noise it makes. Adolf Hitler, leader of the Fascists, secured good support, but nothing like sufficient to give him a chance of becoming head of the state for at least a period of years.

The result of the election is very satisfactory. The president secures the support of the Nationalist and Socialist parties, which are the strongest groups in the country, apparently.

MONEY MEANS LITTLE

The tragic death of George Eastman of Kodak fame indicates how useless it is to expect to secure happiness by means of money. Eastman was fabulously rich. He was a multi-millionaire yet so little did he value life that he died the death of a suicide. From the point of view of the ordinary man on the street his life had been a great success. He had accumulated that which everybody seems bent on accumulating. Everything seemed favorable to him yet he failed in the end.

We all know that money is useful but too much of it is as harmful as too little is inconvenient.

STORY OF EASTMAN

Perfecting Camera—Gave Millions to Charity—Built Up Big Business

The story of George Eastman, whose death is reported, is the story of the modern camera. It is also the story of modern philanthropy. And in and out these stories weaved the narrative of mind, energy and ability devoted to building a business. He gave also his time, his attention and his abilities, that the enormous funds he entrusted to others might wisely be used.

Eastman did not invent the camera—he simplified, improved and popularized it.

He developed dry-plates, making it possible to use the camera without quick access to developing resources. He developed the bromide paper which has become standard in the industry. With others he developed the roll film and the roll film holder, thus further simplifying the camera and extending its scope outside the laboratory.

A few years later he simplified the camera itself and then conceived his own name for it—"Kodak."

Film Development

Eventually the transparent film was developed, making possible the Edison kinetoscope and ensuing improvements in the art of motion picture projection. Subsequently the roll film, both positive for motion picture use and negative for cameras, was improved.

Eastman then turned his attention to improving print paper with the result that ready-sensitized paper replaced the albumenized sheets that needed treatment.

Then came the feature making it possible for cameras to be loaded in the daylight, the "pocket kodak," the machine developing or roll films and the film developing tank.

In 1914 autographic features were introduced permitting memorandum to be made directly on the film at the time a picture was taken.

Meantime Eastman had built up a huge world-wide business enterprise.

Eastman was born at Waterville, Oneida County, on July 12, 1854, the son of George Washington and Maria Kilbourn Eastman. He never married.

His father was a pioneer in the establishment of a business college, but the decline of the institution after his father's death necessitated that the future camera manufacturer leave school when 14 and go to work. He entered a real estate office as errand boy at $3 per week, using part of the salary for the support of his mother and two sisters. A year later he entered the employment of an insurance firm and in 1874 became a book-keeper in the Rochester Savings Bank. By 1880 he had saved $5,000 and this formed the capital for his entry into business on his own account.

He had experimented with amateur photography, studying with a professional photographer and experimenting himself during vacations and in his spare time. His mother's kitchen was his first laboratory, and there he improved upon the dry plates commonly in use. In 1879, he decided to begin commercial manufacture and with one helper in a room over a State Street music store, his "factory" was started.

He worked in the bank by day and in his "factory" at night. He interested a friend, Colonel Henry A. Strong, and with his added capital started the "Eastman Dry Plate Company, Strong and Eastman, proprietors."

This was in 1881, when only 50 dealers in the entire United States were selling photographic goods, and amateur photographers were few. Yet Eastman gave up his position in the bank to devote his time to the dry plate industry.

Developed to Big Thing

In 1925, when he saw his factory expanded to occupy one of the largest plants in Rochester, and other large plants in cities throughout the world, George Eastman resigned as president of the company.

The French government, in 1900, bestowed upon him the decoration of Chevalier of the Legion of Honor in recognition of his accomplishments in the field of photography. Later he became a director of the Metropolitan Opera House of New York.

ests, Eastman found time for recreation.

Mr. Eastman's hours of recreation found him hunting, fishing or camping. He was fond of the theatre. He liked to direct work on his North Carolina farm and he took sheer delight in camping and particularly in camp cooking. In 1926, he started on a trip to Africa, not to hunt but to see the jungles.
