THE CROWNING OF THE KING

After the Diamond Jubilee of her late Majesty Queen Victoria, a young poet, till then scarcely admitted to that most dignified title, wrote a poem that touched the spirit of the nation, and turned its thought from the fever of red hot jingoism, into sober reflection on the duty of Empire. "The Recessional" is the truest poem of Imperialism that Kipling has penned. Long after his flag-waving jingles have been forgotten, that great vespers-hymn of the Imperial spirit will serve to calm and strengthen the soul of a Britain yet to be.

Today, while we dwellers on the far-away frontier of Empire are having our imaginations quickened by the description of ornate Coronation ceremonial and gorgeous trappings of the Imperial pageants, we might with profit remember that this is not the truest symbol of Britain's life and allegiance. At its best it is but a gorgeous pageant, a dramatic symbol of things.

Neither the best nor the worst in our Empire's life is represented there. In that company of princes and rajahs and peers of the realm, no army of the unemployed walks. Yet there is a standing army of unemployed a million strong in Great Britain. There is no delegation from the workhouses of England; no representatives from the sweat shops and child labor factories of the East-End—a district with more population than the Province of British Columbia.

On the other hand there is little representation of the most vital forces in the Empire. There is no delegation of Canadian settlers and settlers' wives from two hundred miles north of the nearest railway; yet such as these are the real advance guards of Empire. There is no delegation from the bands of altruistic men and women of Britain who are devoting their brains, their lives and their fortunes to solve the problem of unemployment, to abolish the sweat shop and child labor factory, and make a better England.

The real thing about the Coronation—the spiritual thing—consists in the adherence of some three hundred million people more or less, to a belief in the British Constitution. That Constitution is typified in the person of the head of the Royal family in his capacity as the custodian of the Constitution. In that sense, there is no doubt that King George is firmly enthroned in the hearts of his people. In that sense he has the acknowledged allegiance of all.

How far the British Constitution has altered, and the nation advanced since so recent a reign as that of George the Third, is seen by the following clipping from the London Times of one hundred years ago:

"On Thursday afternoon, Malcolm Craig, one of the nineteen printers belonging to this office, who were convicted of a conspiracy to raise the prices of wages, died in Newgate."

Were efforts to secure an advance of wages still adjudged a conspiracy, there would have been few men left to cheer the King on his ride through London yesterday. One hundred years ago the people of England were without the franchise, and the whole body of Liberal legislation that has made an Empire possible, was then unborn.

Though the franchise is still refused to half the British people, all the evidences point to the early extension of the right to vote to all adults, without regard to sex. A great body of factory legislation has improved the lot of the toilers. Old age pensions have been introduced to abolish the ignominy of the workhouse. The right of the people to share in the unearned increment of land has been recognised. A scheme of state insurance has been evolved, and the whole problem of unemployment—the most vital problem of all—is being tackled by the present Liberal government of Great Britain.

His Majesty comes to the throne at a great period. If peace is maintained in the world, there is every indication that his reign will become the most glorious and the most progressive in the world's history.

THE CORONATION

stable, the Lord Great Chamberlain, and the Earl Marshal walked to the four sides of the Abbey. Raising the King up, the Archbishop showed the King to the people on the four sides of the Abbey, each time calling out "Sirs, I here present unto you King George, the undoubted King of this realm: Wherefore do you who are come this day to do your homage and service?"

Accepted as King

The cry was repeated by the official at each side of the church, while the people cried out "God save King George."

As the last cry ended, the trumpets sounded, and the bishops brought the Bible, paten and chalice to the altar, while the lords brought the regalia, which was also placed on the altar.

Took Official Oath

This portion of the service, known as "The Recognition" being ended, communion was administered to the King and Queen after which the Coronation Oath was presented. After the oath was given, the King returned to his seat beside the Queen, where after the singing of the hymn Veni Creator Spiritus the Archbishop poured the sacred oil from the ampulla into a spoon and anointed the King in the form of a cross on the head first, and afterwards on the breast and hands.

A Scene of Splendour

Then followed a scene of great splendour. The King was led to the throne and clothed with a mantle of cloth of gold, with a girdle of the same precious substance. A pair of golden spurs were brought forward and a costly sword in a scabbard of purple velvet. The spurs were touched against his Majesty's heels by the Lord High Chamberlain, and the sword presented to His Majesty by the Archbishop, with the injunction "With this sword do justice, stop the growth of iniquity, protect the holy Church of God, help and defend widows and orphans, restore the things that are gone to decay, maintain the things that are restored, punish and reform what is amiss, and confirm what is in good order; that doing these things you may be glorious in all virtue; and so faithfully serve our Lord Jesus Christ in this life, that you may reign forever with Him in the life which is to come."

Is Given a Crown

The royal robe, a jewel and a royal sceptre were then delivered to the King followed by the placing of the crown on the King's head, with the words: "God crown you with a crown of glory and righteousness, that by the ministry of this our benediction, having a right faith and manifold fruit of good works, you may obtain the crown of everlasting Kingdom by the gift of Him whose kingdom endureth forever. Amen."

Acclaimed as King

At the sight of the crown on the head of the King, the peers put on their coronets, and shouted "God save the King," the trumpeters blew a blast on their trumpets, and at the signal the great guns at the Tower boomed out over the noise of the waiting multitudes in the streets. The peers and princes in their turn, knelt in their places before the King and rendered homage saying: "I become your leige man of life and limb, and of earthly worship; and faith and truth I will bear unto you, to live and die, against all manner of folks. So help me God."

Crowned the Queen

The ceremony of the Coronation of the Queen was much shorter and simpler than that of the King. After a prayer at the altar she was anointed, kneeling at a fald-stool between the steps and St. Edward's Chair, while four Peers held a canopy of cloth of gold above her head. Then the Archbishop put the Royal ring on the fourth finger of her right hand, and, taking the Crown from the altar, set it on her head, whereupon all the Peers put on their coronets. Having received the Sceptre in her right hand and the ivory rod surmounted by a dove in her left hand, her Majesty, supported by two Bishops went to her throne, bowing to the King as she approached him.

Drive Through London

After making the usual oblation of a rich altar cloth and a bar of gold, the King and Queen divested themselves of some of their robes and insignia, but retained their crowns, and drove through the streets back to the palace.

A Royal Reception

From the multitudes that lined the streets, their Majesties received a royal welcome, being received with deafening cheers for the entire length of the journey. To the plaudits of the multitude, they responded with gracious bows.
