A GREAT BRITISHER

There never was a man like Viscount Grey of Fallodon, T news of whose death was received yesterday. An aristo- Tea Restriction crat of the old-fashioned type he was also in many respects a commoner and a modernist of the most advanced type. Living a life of detachment a good deal of the time, his sympathies were all with the under-privileged men and women of the kingdom and of the world. He loved the country, revelled in the beauties of nature, was on close in order to raise prices to growers. speedy and their work so efficient terms with the birds and animals and other living crea- who, for almost four years, had that we can say "Business as tures, yet few men of his day wielded as great an influence been suffering devastating losses, wal."
