In the third place the terrific expense of transporting the fish would make us completely unable to meet eastern competition."

Mr. Finn alluded to a situation which was developing on the eastern markets whereby the public, in these times of depression, was turning to the cheaper varieties of fish and had found that they liked strictly fresh cod and haddock better, or just as well, as the Pacific Coast halibut which, after all, was anything but an actually fresh fish by the time it reached the east. If conditions in the Pacific Coast halibut fishery did not change, he looked for a gradual decline in the consumption of halibut until it was maintained by the relatively few people who could afford halibut and felt they must have it. It was along the lines of meeting this newly developing situation that the Prince Rupert Fisheries Experimental Staion and its staff was devoting efforts towards bringing about unprovements and economies in freezing, storage and transportation of
