Remains of Sea Monster Brought to City and Being Reassembled Today

Red Flesh Found

Further Examination Leads to Belief That Extreme Length Was About Thirty Feet

Having brought in from Henry Island late last night aboard a fisheries patrol boat which had been placed at their disposal the head, pinal column, two flapper-like apendages, joints of tissues, some cartilagenous body material, quills, hair and skin of a strange marine monster which they had spent yesterday in dissecting, Dr. Neal Carter, director of the Prince Rupert isheries Experimental Station, end members of his staff were enaged today in reassembling the pody at the government wharf for public exhibit. The object is to reonstruct the remains as nearly as possible to the shape in which they ere found a few days ago on Jenry Island. Much interest is beng taken in the find and the idenity of the creature, which in life is clieved to have been probably bout thirty feet in length, is still mystery.

On further inspection of the renains yesterday, the interesting scovery was made of large quanies of red flesh around the backme. This would appear to put the eature definitely out of the fish class and it is now believed that it as some sort of warm-blooded nammal. Before minute inspection us made, it was thought the creaare might have been a species of ant ray or skate but the discovery of the red flesh eliminates this heory. The best known of the nammals is the whale but this, of ourse, is no whale as previous decription makes quite evident.
