Ancient Deed To English Property Comes to Light

A rather unusual legal document, unique on account of its great age, has been turned over to City Solicior E. F. Jones by an unemployed person in the form of an original parchment deed made out in the year 1620 during the reign of King James I under which a man named John Dilly transferred to John Creeke a house and parcel of land abutting the village common in the village of King Sutton, Northamptonshire, England. There were no blank printed deed forms in those days as there are today and this document has been laboriously printed out in script, the phraseology being, however, largely similar to Third Ave. that which is used today. The document is in an excellent state of preservation. The owner would sell it to any person who might be interested in such a relic.

Mining has entered on a period of renewed activity. Employment in mining increased 8% in 1933. It was responsible for the furnishing of much more employment in associated industries. Its importance as a producer of new wealth and as source of employment, directly and indirectly, may be expected to materially increase throughout 1934.
