

Turity and Treshness

Users of tobacco in any form are always assured of purity and freshness when they buy a product of the Imperial Tobacco Company. These qualities are achieved only by the practice of eternal vigilance.

That vigilance starts with the education of the grower, in methods of cutting and curing that ensure the utmost cleanliness and wholesomeness in the leaf as delivered. The grading is all done over screens, to remove sand. Leaves showing any blemish, are immediately destroyed. After that the stock is submitted to a forced-draft heat treatment that mellows and conditions the tobacco.

During the three-year ageing process, the leaf lies packed in hogsheads, for, like wine, it mellows best in wood. These hogsheads are stored in bond by themselves in modern warehouses through which the outside air moves freely. The sweating induced by summer heat and humidity has the effect of dispelling harshthess, and leaving the leaf sweeter and softer to the taste.

During the manufacturing process, as a protection against even the most remote possibility of contamination, the leaf is handled in rooms where the air is filtered of all impurities, humidified to prevent dust, and where walls are being constantly whitewashed.

Yet that is only the beginning. Every single shipment of a material that directly or indirectly enters into the manufacture of any Imperial product must first pass its prescribed laboratory test, to determine whether it fully measures up to the purity Istandard set for it. If not, it is instantly rejected. And in the case of cigarette paper, there are easily a dozen different tests, chemical and physical, that must be survived before any shipment is permitted to be used.

When the manufactured tobacco is ready for packaging, it is of course in prime condition. It is to ensure its reaching the consumer in equally good condition that so much care is taken, so much expense incurred, with the wrapping. Waxed paper, tin foil, cellophane, snugly-fitting packages and hermetically-sealed tins are only a few of the devices employed to conserve freshness.

Finally, such is the reputation enjoyed by Imperial products for purity and freshness, that the large and steady demand for them assures a quickness of turnover that precludes any possibility of their growing stale on the retailer's shelves.
