Mysterious disappearance of eel grass from the Atlantic seaboard between North Carolina and the Strait of Belle Isle may cause total evacuation of the Eastern Brant, popular game bird, from Maritime Canada, according to Hoyes Lloyd, official of the National Parks Branch, Department of the Interior. Accompanied by Robert W. Tufts, Wolfville, N.S., chief federal migratory bird officer for the Maritime Provinces, he addressed the Saint John branch of the New Brunswick Fish and Game Protective Association. Both are recognized as outstanding authorities on wildfowl conservation. Since eel grass, afflicted by some unknown malady, began disappearing in 1930, flocks of Eastern Brant had become seriously depleted especially in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, said Mr. Lloyd. This grass represents about 90 percent of the birds' food.

Efforts have been made to determine the numerical status of the brant in succeeding seasons. Latest findings of the survey were described by Mr. Lloyd as "gloomy." Unless eel grass recovered from the mysterious scourge he feared that brant would continue to decrease until they vanished from New Brunswick shores. The malady broke out at North Carolina and worked up to the Strait of Belle Isle, extreme northern location of the marine plant. Mr. Lloyd termed the Migratory Birds Treaty between United States and Canada "a most important pact to hunters." This treaty includes agreement that migratory birds belong to both countries and that the matter of adequate protection rests with hunters north and south of the border. During this fiscal year, he added, the United States was spending $8,500,000 for game bird protection in addition to the usual vote of $1,000,000.
