BRITISH ELECTIONS

The victory of the Conservatives in the British elections came as no surprise to people who were familiar with the situation. It was expected that the government majority would be reduced but, as it is, it will have a good working majority of between two and three hundred. The old majority of 405 was too overwhelming for good government.

It may be taken for granted that, under ordinary conditions, the British National government would have found it difficult to secure sufficient support to enable it, to carry on. With something of an international crisis, it became necessary to impress Italy and other countries that the people of Britain were behind their administration in imposing sanctions through the League of Nations. In fact, support of the League was a potent factor in inducing many who might normally have been labor supporters to vote for the government.

TWO IMPORTANT PARTIES LEFT

There are only two important parties left in the United Kingdom today-Conservative and Labor. Gradually the Liberals are being eliminated until less than a dozen remain in the opposition. It is very doubtful if the party will ever come back unless there should be a break in labor ranks that might throw the more conservative labor supporters with the Liberals.

RAMSAY MACDONALD AND OTHERS

Most people will regret the defeat of the fine old political warrior, Right Hon. J. Ramsay MacDonald. One cannot but admire his courage in deserting the Labor Party when he considered it his duty to do so and leading the National Government through difficult times. Evidently, he did not expect the defeat but it was a likely thing to happen. People do not usually like a turncoat and he is bound to be accused of turning in order to secure the high office for which he was chosen.

Lloyd George is in a different class. He was at one time more radical than ever Ramsay MacDonald was. He headed a war government and gradually has been eliminated from the councils of the nation but his people in Wales continue to elect him. He is still an outstanding personality and is an ornament to Parliament.

Those who like to see a man in the House who has no reverence for anyone or anything will be glad to see Mc-Govern of Glasgow re-elected. Possibly the day will yet come when McGovern will come to realize that there is in the world something to revere and admire besides blatant bad manners.
