HARROWING EXPERIENCE OF WALTER SIMPSON AND WIFE ON STIKINE RIVER VOYAGE

Were Half-Starved in Thirty-Day Battle With Slush Ice Between Telegraph Creek and Wrangell—Abandoned Boat to Pull Sled

Walter Simpson and his wife, who were missing for nearly a month on a trip by outboard motorboat from Telegraph Creek, were half-starved after battling with slush ice on the Stikine River to reach Wrangell, according to particulars of their harrowing trip which reached the city today. Their rations ran short after the first week following their departure from Telegraph Creek on October 29 and they lived on four slices of bread a day for the last five days.

The couple ran into many ice jams, one of them seventeen miles long, and had to pull their twenty-two foot outboard motorboat over the ice and relay six hundred pounds of baggage by sleigh.

Later Simpson found a cross-cut saw in an old cabin and cut the boat down to eight feet, leaving the engine and gasoline behind.

At Great Glacier they had to abandon the boat because of four inches of slush ice. They trudged on, pulling the sled, until they reached the mouth of the Stikine River where Simpson found and repaired an old skiff. They made oars from driftwood and rowed to Berger's ranch on Farm Island where word was flashed of their safety through amateur wireless facilities via Calgary to Prince Rupert.

Mr. and Mrs. Simpson reached Wrangell on Monday night.

Provincial Constable J. V. Boys of Telegraph Creek, formerly of Prince Rupert, left Telegraph Creek by dog team a week ago to search for Mr. and Mrs. Simpson. Efforts are now being made to locate him to advise him that they have turned up safely. No contact had been made up to last night.
