Reindeer For Eskimos End Five Year Arctic Trek

For five years and two months a great herd of reindeer has been trekking across Arctic wastes to the Mackenzie river delta in Canada's northwest territories. The great trek will end about the middle of March. In 1929 the Canadian government purchased from the herds in Kotzebue Sound area in western Alaska, a herd of 3,000 picked deer. For four years they wandered, under guidance, across the Arctic circle until they arrived within 70 miles of their destination. But blizzards and extreme cold held them up for another year, and only now is the herd, vastly different to the original, arriving at the Mackenzie delta to feed and clothe the Eskimos of that district. Layout shows guides leading great herd and close-up picture of some of animals.
