Little in the chair, by tellthe fares of the lecturers should be baid from the fund provided and that each community might look after the accommodation of the isitors while in the city. This would enable more extensive courses to be given.

Dr. Warren explained the attitude the university took toward all political and other movements. They were not communist or red but they welcomed discussions of all public questions and encouraged students to study them. They tried to so train the students that they would be swayed only by facts and not by fiery oratory. The University depended for its existence on the goodwill of the people and they wanted an opportunity to
