Restriction Needed

In accomplishing this duty the commission has demonstrated that the total catch from Area 2 can be maintained and decline prevented by a proper restriction of the fishery. This has meant a shorter season to the fleet but not a reduction in the total poundage allowed.

Common sense indicates that it is better to preserve the fishery even though the season is somewhat shorter. The commission has had the fishery and the stock of halibut under close and continued observa-26 tion. It finds that although there was some spawning and production of young before 1930, neither the decline in total catch nor in production of spawn was stopped by the closed season. The changes which have occurred have been entirely different from those which should have taken place if 97 the close season had been effective 62 alone. Since 1930 the stock of fish on the banks has increased, the decline in total catch has been stopped, a larger number of the halibut on the banks grow to breeding size, and the production of more spawn has apparently already begun. The banks are once more in a healthy condition, and although this is as yet due entirely to more rational treatment of what young have been produced by the depleted banks, yet as soon as these young commence to increase, the total catch can also be increased.

Fleet Was Warned

The shorter season was foreseen by the commission, and the fleet warned that some means of curtailment to spread the catch would be advisable. Three years ago at the request of the fleets themselves, the commission prepared an amendment to the treaty which would allow it to take responsibility for legally supporting curtailment so that this curtailment would apply to all boats. This amendment was refused by the Seattle vessel owners, and the responsibility for the shortened season and the failure of curtailment to apply to all boats is entirely with this fleet. To the best knowledge of the commission, this amendment still reposes in Washington and Ottawa, awaiting action at any time the fleet may de-

In other words the total poundage permitted the Area 2 fleet has been maintained and not reduced, and in addition they have been given time to engage in other fisheries which have been shown to be productive by actual figures as to the shares received.

The heavier the fishing the less the total catch.
