EDUCATION

This is Education Week and an attempt is being made to OILERS ON interest everybody in education. For those who have children attending the schools, the week is unnecessary. All parents must be interested in education whether they wish to be or not. Never a day passes but they hear something share about it. Usually they have to struggle with one or more pupils to make them prepare their homework or, easier still, do it for them. They have the problems of the school yard to deal with, the language question. For instance, three games to nil last night and they find their children coming home and telling that moved into a tie with Three Two their side won two "ghouls" in the football match. Evi- cial Bowling League standing. In dently it is the language of the school grounds in playtime the second fixture of the evening period. and arguments against it are useless. They are Last night's scoring: the people who bear the brunt of caring for the next generation and all the recognition they get for the work they do is a reduction of two or three dollars a year from their income tax. If teachers are underpaid, what about parents?

Just now there is a movement toward making some changes in the method of teaching. Fewer examination tests are to be made, it is said, but fewer exams with a good many teachers means less effort and less progress. If all teachers were perfect there would be no need of any examinations. The examination system was found necessary because, without it, the teachers did not do their duty. The pupils did not make progress.

Education methods move in cycles. One year we adopt a new system and after testing it a few years we find it desirable to revert to the old system in order to show that we are progressive.

Without the intervention of "a week" we shall all be interested in education as long as the race continues. We might even consider the education of teachers with a view to having them keep up-to-date. However, there is no harm in this effort to focus public attention on the schools and their problems and we hope good may come of it.
