Hoare Suggests Anglo-American Coalition

World peace, assured by the combined sea strength of England and United States, was visualized in a speech by Sir Samuel Hoare (lower right), first lord of the admiralty, in London. He indicated that Britain would pursue her announced policy of building up the fleet in co-operation with increased air efficiency, so that "when supported as it may be by the other great naval power, it will once again make a world war impossible." The "other great naval power" was interpreted to mean United States. Units of the two fleets that may some day work together include the big U.S.S. Arkansas at right and First British cruiser squadron moving in battle formation at the left. Starting at the bottom the British ships are H.M.S. Shropshire, Devonshire and London.

"I regret I am not in a position to add anything today but I hope to make a statement tomorrow," the Premier said in reply to a question by Clement Atlee, Labor leader.

Party whips instructed all members of the House to cancel engagements outside of London in preparation for the Premier's expected pronouncement tomorrow on the King's decision.

Mr. Atlee mentioned the growing anxiety all over the country for the King's decision. The Premier replied that no one realized the anxiety more than he did.

Frederick Bellenger, Labor, said that business had been inconvenienced by the situation and asked if Mr. Baldwin would kindly suggest to the King the necessity of arriving at an early decision.

Shouts for "Order" interrupted the question but Mr. Baldwin said it had not escaped him.

Prior to the session of the House of Commons, cabinet ministers gathered in full session. It was believed that Premier Baldwin had related to his ministers details of the lengthy interview with the King yesterday.

Cabinet in Session

Premier Baldwin called the cabinet into sudden unexpected session tonight to discuss latest developments in the constitutional crisis. The summons for the special cabinet meeting was interpreted to mean that every facility of the government was being pressed into action to enable a definite statement for Parliament tomorrow.
