LEGAL DOCUMENTS

The trial in which a northern miner was sent to jail for using a gun draws particular attention to the wording of many legal documents. George Adsit, the man who was convicted and is being punished for the offence of driving several men off his mining claim with a gun, produced an agreement which said that if the lessees did not carry out their part of the agreement they could be put off the property, so he proceeded to put them off. He evidently did not realize that the real meaning of the document was that he could apply to the courts for an order to have them removed. The document said nothing about applying to the court. The average person knowing nothing of the law would understand that he could act on his own initiative.

There is a similar case in connection with the purchase of property on an agreement of sale. The agreement specifically states that if the payments are not made the agreement becomes null and void and the vendor can again take possession. But he cannot take possession without applying to the courts and paying the necessary fees. After an agreement of sale has been given it costs something like on hundred dollars to recover the property in the event of the purchaser not making his payments.

Ancient phraseology in legal documents should be abolished and forms affecting the common people should be simplified so that they mean exactly what they say. If a certain form of lease had meant what it said, one man at least may not have been in jail today.

GIVING UP POLITICS

The United Church of Canada at its general council meeting conferred on women the right to ordination as ministers of the Gospel. It was noticeable at the same time that the general council refrained from talking politics. It may have been that it was found the policy of having the church take part in political movements would not do when women became ministers. Usually they take their politics too seriously and cannot argue without bitterness.

On the whole it seems as if it is wise for a church to refrain from political action, no matter under what name it may be introduced. It is better for members of a religious denomination to act individually through its political affiliation to secure changes that may be desirable rather than lay down a policy for the church as a whole.

MEETING OF DEBT

President Roosevelt Says Cost Of Depression Will Be Paid From Greater Income of Prosperous Times

PITTSBURG, Oct. 3:—Speaking before an audience of over sixty thousand persons at Forbes Field Thursday night in the second address of his presidential campaign tour, President Franklin D. Roosevelt discussed the manner in which he planned the cost of the depression would be met. Billions that had been spent would not be saddled on future generations but would be paid from increased national and individual income due to the greater prosperity of the country. There need be no fear of a future burden. The national debt had been increased, President Roosevelt admitted, but declared that, in proportion to the national income, it was less than it was four years ago. In 1932 the national income had been $38,000,000,000. In 1935 it had risen to $52,000,000,000 and this year, he predicted, it would amount to $60,000,000,000.

"Progress has been faster than we dared hope for," declared President Roosevelt. He asked his listeners right in this city to compare conditions today with those in 1932 before his administration had taken office. Then there was idleness, hunger and dark factories. Today there was whirling of machinery and bustle of industry again. Such was the score this year and four years ago.

Not a single bank had failed in the country in the last year, declared the President. This was an achievement that had not been known in 55 years.

Prior to his address here, President Roosevelt spoke at Syracuse, N.Y., where he declared that Communism had been raised as a false issue in the campaign. Far from having any Communist leanings, the President declared that he stood for a continuation of the present form of government and was opposed to any foreign "isms."
