Where Inventor and 13 Others Died in Crash

The crushed and still-flaming wreckage of the Royal Dutch airliner which crashed into an empty house a few seconds after leaving Croydon airport, England, is shown here. Fourteen persons died in the crash, including Juan de la Cierva, inventor of the autogyro. The aeroplane crash caused the empty house to go up in flames, adding to horror of the scene.

you have for this gathering of women assembled here today. I assure your listeners, will be uttered in words of wisdom, guidance and inspiration that will help us in rendering better service to the community in which we live, through following the motto of our Order and that of every loyal subject of the Empire—Respecting One Flag, Honoring One Throne and Strengthening One Empire."

The Excellency's Reply

In response, Lady Tweedsmuir expressed her pleasure on arrival in Prince Rupert and her delight in the marvellous scenery of British Columbia—ever Her Excellency's favorite province—with its snow-capped mountains, wonderful trees and leaves, beautiful wild flowers and gorgeous colorings of natural beauty seen in this province particularly. Victoria especially charmed her and she voiced her wish that it were possible to take up residence on a little island near that city where groceries could be delivered in a small boat.

Continuing the speaker remarked particularly on I.O.D.E. educational work which she had always been interested in. She had been responsible for inauguration of "The Prairie Library" a scheme, much needed and appreciated in isolated prairie sections, where people lived lonely lives and, through hardships, were unable to purchase reading material. Lady Tweedsmuir belongs to a family of authors and, therefore, was keenly interested along this line.

Concluding, Her Excellency thanked the I.O.D.E. for their pres-

SPORTSMEN
Imagine your favorite hunting ground reduced to a desert of charred snags—your pet stream choked with debris—your campsite a desolation. One moment's carelessness may do this—one burning match, cigarette or camp fire may ruin millions of feet of timber; destroy watershed for lakes and streams, and vital cover for game.
