PAST FIGHTERS

Everybody knows how baseball players, professional and otherwise, engage in fanning bees of the past and present; recall the great feats of the diamond and praise the doings of other days. But did any one ever mix in a bunch of pugilistic fanners and hear any more enthusiastic buzzing than the glove wielders can turn loose? The answer is "no," for the old time fighters are just as talkative a tribe as ever could be gotten together.

Recently a bunch of fighters, past, present and future, got together in a Chicago gymnasium, and after fights without number of years ago had been masticated to the king's taste, one of the bunch propounded a question of natural interest: "What becomes of the fighters when their days of activity in the ring are at an end?"

The question set everybody thinking, and in order to answer it was necessary to "take cases" on some of the fighters who in the last few years have left the ring for all time. It was discovered that a great many of the pugilists had become policemen. In Chicago, the home of many of the best fighters who ever stepped between the ropes, there are many of the former glove wielders who now swing a club instead of the mauls.

Remember Martin Duffy, who was one of the topnotch lightweights of his time, which was only a few years ago? Duffy can be found any night in Chicago travelling a beat. He isn't a lightweight any more, but has joined the heavyweight class. Duffy certainly was a star at cleverness, something like Packey McFarland.

Jack Moffat, the middleweight who possessed class, but failed to become a champion, partly because he dislocated a shoulder in a fight, is a policeman and travels a beat over Chicago streets. Moffat met the brilliant Tommy Ryan more than once in the ring and Tommy always gave Moffat credit for being a fighter of the first water. The bad arm finally stopped Moffat's career and he donned the suit of blue as a means of livelihood. There are several others of lesser note in Chicago who swing the club, but as their acquaintance pugilistically did not extend beyond the confines of the Lake Michigan city on more need be said of them.

Jimmy Barry, the wonderful little champion of the ring in his day, also is living in Chicago. Jimmy continues to make friends just as he always did, and is earning a living with something besides, now that he no longer takes a swing on the other fellow's jaw. Barry spends the summer months working in the public playgrounds, where he is considered a huge success.

"Kid" Herman, another Chicago lightweight, is a real business man and success has brought him plenty of the shekels. The "Kid" is in Seattle, where he is proprietor of a florist's shop. Herman almost reached the pinnacle of fame, the obstacle in his path being that wonderful colored fighter, Joe Gans, now dead.

George Kerwin, once a Chicago lightweight of note, is a saloonkeeper in Chicago.

Joe Choyinski, who has made Chicago his home for many years after leaving California, has earned a living, and a good one, too, by teaching the game that made him famous. Choyinski is now boxing instructor at the millionaire athletic club of Pittsburg. Previous to leaving Chicago he conducted a physical culture school and also was instructor at the Illinois Athletic Club.

Tommy White, who gained fame by his great rights with "Terrible Terry" McGovern, still holds forth in Chicago. For the last couple of years he has been employed in construction work on a big underground telephone tunnel.

The once great Australian middleweight, George Dawson, who fought many battles of note, is boxing instructor at the Chicago Athletic Association.

Then there is Eddie Santry, who at one time claimed the featherweight championship. Eddie a couple of years ago was proprietor of a saloon, but now is officiating as referee of bouts in Wisconsin cities.
