Do you know, I think in some ways we are cheating our children of a great deal of future pleasure by letting the radio so completely fill our lives. It is so simple just to turn the dial and have ready-made music, be it classic or jazz, that we have llost the incentive to learn to play the piano or have our children learn. Once it was considered a requisite of a lady.

Every day for years and yearsi was forced to practice. At the time it was more painful than pleasant but now I am beginning to reap my reward. I never d'd become much of a sensation as a musician but I did learn to love! and appreciate good music and how to listen intelligently to someone else play.

Watching young people who did not "suffer' this advantage, I now realize just how much I did learn in those years of practicing; scales and struggling with Beethoven, Bach and other masters. My execution may not have been so good and it is years now since have touched a piano. However, my repertoire was extensive and it is that that is now giving me so much pleasure. Stone Upon Which England's First Kings Were Crowned

The coronation of King George VI revives interest in the King's Stone at Kingston-on-Thames, England, which was centre of the ceremonial at the crowning of seven kings, from Edward the Elder to Ethelred, including Athelstan, the first sovereign to call himself "King of the English." Athelstan was installed with "dreade and marvellous cerymonie" in 925. The stone is the centre of attention from many visitors.
