Japanese planes dumped bombs on the northern border of the international settlement late today a few hours after warning British troops to evacuate outposts on the western boundary. The Japanese said they were about to bomb Chinese communication lines and advised British troops to move their positions. The bombs played havoc with life and property but achieved no apparent military objective.

Twelve miles north of Shanghai major fighting occured today with the Japanese asserting their troops were approaching the walls of Paoshan and the Chinese declaring that they were holding firm.

An unconfirmed report said that Chinese military planes had flown to Japan and bombed Kagoshima, southermost port of importance in Japan proper.
