KING AND QUEEN SHARED IN WORK OF GREAT WAR THO' ONLY IN THEIR TEENS

Coming Visit to Canada Recalls Their Majesties' Varied Activities in Country's Services

For many Canadians who fought in the Great War the visit of the King and Queen next spring will mean a rekindling of memories of their overseas service 20 years ago. It is possible some of those who cheer Their Majesties as they traverse the Dominion may have served with the King in the navy or in the Royal Naval Air Service.

... and the loveliest pair of blue eyes I'd ever seen."

Memorable Birthday

One of the most memorable days of the Queen's life was surely her 14th birthday. The day falls on August 4 and in 1914 she was in London celebrating with a trip to the theatre. Both actors and audience were aroused by news of the declaration of war and in the streets outside there was cheering, military bands and the tramp of marching columns.

Within a week all four of the Strathmore boys—Patrick, John, Michael and Fergus—had joined the army. Glamis was undergoing its metamorphosis and her elder sister, Lady Rose Bowes-Lyon, was training as a war nurse.

It was not long before war took its toll. In September, 1915, Fergus was killed in action at Loos. Two years later Michael was reported killed but actually had been taken prisoner. He was held in one of the worst of the German prison camps but that did not prevent him from refusing a chance to be sent to Holland in favor of a brother officer who was badly wounded.

For the King the war reached its climax on that May day when the two of Hipper's cruisers hove out of North Sea mists before Earl Jellicoe's Grand Fleet at Jutland. Having graduated from the Royal Naval College at Dartmouth just before the war, he had reached by then the post of second-in-command of No. 1 turret on the battleship Collingwood.

Cited By Jellicoe

In the brief engagement of the Grand Fleet the Collingwood took on the cruiser Derfflinger and fought off some destroyers. The big shells made fountains around the ship. At a high point of the engagement the youthful prince was sent to make cocoa for the sweating gun crews. The Derfflinger scored hits upon the Collingwood but herself was badly crippled. After the battle Earl Jellicoe cited Prince Albert for courage and coolness under fire.

The King still has a cherished memento of Jutland in one of the white ensigns flown by the Collingwood during the battle. He once made a humorous reference to the cocoa episode when preparing an evening snack in his home. "Let me make the cocoa," he said to his wife and guests. "I know all about his job."

Soon after Jutland ill-health sent the prince ashore and following a serious operation he was ordered a period of land duty. The new-born prince's service was still without a royal wing commander to become group recruit and the prince was attached to the Royal Naval Air Service. It is recorded that on the day he was to take his final test as a pilot a high wind was blowing and he was strongly advised not to go up that day. But this suggestion did not appeal to the prince. With the remark: "I can't have it hanging over my head," he went up and passed with flying colors.

Stationed at R.N.A.S. headquarters at Nancy, France, he steadily progressed up the ladder through the ranks of squadron leader and wing commander to become group captain before peace came.
