Fight Against Nature In Wilds of Quebec

By New York Writer

NEW YORK, Oct. 18.—Burt M. McConnell, the writer who is making a fight against nature in the wilds of Quebec, did not quite follow out the original idea. He took an axe with him instead of making a flint axe, and he found an old moose hide cached in the top of a tree which he used for clothing. On the second day he caught a little rabbit in a snare and for the first time he then made a fire by the friction method and cooked and ate his first meal. For the next two days he did not eat, but continued to perfect his living arrangements.

There are 550 species and sub-species of monkeys.
