BEING CRITICAL

A recent article from an Ottawa correspondent of one of the southern newspapers points out that Ontario and Quebec have been very critical of the Mackenzie King government but they were equally critical of the Bennett government of which Dr. Manion was a member. The French Canadians, like the rest of Canadians, are a critical people and they are apt to be more critical of small acts of government or government failures to act than they are of the big policies on which governments expect to stand or fall.

From that the correspondent deduces that it is quite a different thing criticizing the government to opposing it at an election. The French Canadian people still remember Laurier and his liberalism and, although they elected Duplessis in Quebec, it was not because he was a Conservative but because he was against an extremely conservative Liberal administration. Mr. Duplessis has explained that his administration was formed from the best elements in both parties and, while he personally was formerly a Conservative, it does not follow that he will support either of the big political parties in a federal contest. He makes it clear that he has all he can do just now to carry out his provincial mandate without interfering with federal affairs.

In Prince Rupert we are apt to be critical. We damn the government for all our ills and yet there is not a city of this size in the Dominion that has had as much government help as Prince Rupert. If business is slack the government is at fault. If the city does not increase in population it is because of the short-sighted policy of the government. And yet we are a pampered lot. The government is not responsible for the fact that there are more than sufficient business people in the city to supply the market. Of course, we are critical. This is an age of criticism. It is an age when people are taking an interest in their governments-federal, provincial and civic. That all makes for better government. The danger is when strong pressure is brought to bear upon any government to spend large sums of money for things that are not of benefit to the country as a whole.

PERSONAL POLITICS

Much of our politics is purely personal. Take as an instance the man who has been a failure in his business or profession. Finding that he cannot make a success at anything, he blames it on the system and decides to vote in favor of changing the system. Most of the adherents of "change the system" politics have been failures somewhere.

Again we find a man prominent in the life of the community suddenly changing his political affiliation. Usually it is found that he has been trying to get something for himself or a friend and, because he has not succeeded, he blames the party or the party leaders. Possibly, he tries several times before he leaves the party but, eventually, he turns against either the party or the leaders or both. That is personal politics.
