PRINCIPLES OF ROTARY EXPOUNDED

Never Did World Need Their Application More Than Today, District Governor Tells Local Club

There was never a time when the principles of friendship and goodwill as exemplified by the Rotary organization were more needed by the world than today, declared Dr. Henry Cline Fixott of Portland, Oregon, district governor of Rotary International, in an address at an official visitation to the Prince Rupert club last evening. Dr. Fixott, in an inspirational manner, spoke of the possibilities of Rotary activities in an international way as well as from the standpoint of the local communities. He stressed the idea of youth service, expressing the view, however, that the principle of self-reliance should always be inculcated.

Rotarians, Dr. Fixott said, should keep the aims of their organization ever in view and work steadfastly toward their accomplishment. They should not give in to discouragement wherein lay defeat. Nor should the idea be that the happiest man was one with the most money. The speaker developed the cardinal Rotary principle of service before self.

Dr. Fixott traced the phemonenal growth of Rotary from the time of its founding in 1905 by Paul Harris and his small group of friends in Chicago up to today which found the organization with hundreds of thousands of members in hundreds of countries in all parts of the world. The district governor considered as a tribute to Rotary the disbanding a year ago of the clubs in Germany, Austria and Czecho-Slovakia. This was an admission by the dictators, he felt, of the force and influence of Rotary for peace and international understanding.

President Peter Lakie was in the chair at the dinner and duly welcomed Dr. Fixott, later expressing appreciation of the members for the fine address. There were about thirty members present.

AMUSED BY AFFRONTS

General Sir Hubert Gough And Field Marshal Lord Milne Given Minor National Defence Posts

LONDON, August 23: (CP)—How Evacuation Officer Gough and Air Raid Warden Milne waded through official red tape to their National Service posts has created a cheery diversion for English newspapers on an otherwise serious newsfront.

General Sir Hubert Gough, 68, commander of the Fifth Army in the battles of the Somme and Ypres, told with a chuckle how he finally got the job of escorting a group of mothers and their children from a Fulham school to the nearest railway station in an emergency.

Field Marshal Lord Milne, 72, for seven years chief of the Imperial General Staff and commander of the Salonika and Black Sea forces in the Great War, also was amused at the job allotted to him.

Trained from boyhood for the army, General Gough thought there might still be a place for him in the defence program.

He saw Prime Minister Chamberlain who thanked him for his offer but said there was nothing he could do "at the moment." Then Sir Hubert wrote Sir Auckland Geddes, collaborator of Sir John Anderson, ARP chief. Once again he was told there was nothing for him "at the moment."

Then he wrote the Labor Ministry. "They passed my letter to the London County Council who passed it to their education committee. They sent me a printed card asking if I could cook; if I knew anything about camping, and what training I had in the care of children.

"I replied that I was a good plain cook, able to make a cup of tea and boil an egg; that I thought I knew a little about camping but that my knowledge of the care of children was nil.

"That didn't put them off one little bit. They handed my dossier to the L. C. C. and in due course I got a circular from the L. C. C. Education Officers' Department saying that volunteers were required to help evacuate children.

Doctor In Command

"They wanted to know if I had common sense and the capacity to keep my head in a crisis. I have now got my mobilization orders and I am, presumably, to carry out the orders of a Kensington doctor my commander-in-chief."

He said there could have been no doubt as to who he was because all his letters had been addressed to "General Sir Hubert Gough." "I had an idea" Mr. Chamberlain might like to send me as Ambassador to Spain, put me in charge of food control or something like that. It seems I'm more useful as a nurse. Still there's always one job I'm not too old for. I could be Prime Minister."

The Evening Standard took up the General's last point and declared: "If 68 is the limit, we should apply it to our legislators and put them in positions more suitable to their capacities. If not, why not make better use of Sir Hubert's fine patriotism?"

Meantime, after an exchange of letters extending over six months, officialdom found a job for Field Marshal Lord Milne. He announced the City of Westminster had accepted him as Air Raid Warden. "I will train with 20 other men and will go through the whole syllabus." When he completes his course he will be posted for the Strand district.

His original offer to serve in any capacity was declined. Later he applied unsuccessfully to the Air Ministry for work with the balloon barrage.
