ependence. There is still a question, however, as to what might be considered a threat of Poland's independence. Poland reiterates that any attempt to disturb the status que of the free port of Danzig will oe resisted with armed strength. Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain, making an appeal last night for volunteers for the civil defence arm, repeated that the British government would take a determined stand against aggression. The country did not wish war but was ready to put in its whole strength in a fight against aggression and in coming to the defence of nations whose security Great Britain had guaranteed. King George and Prime Minister Chamberlain tonight joined in a broadcast warning to Germany that Great Britain is resolute in its determination to prevent aggression. The Prime Minister stated that the British people were peaceful and desired no quarrels with anyone but added: "Let no one make the mistake of supposing we are not ready to resist agression whether against ourselves or against those whose independence we have undertaken to defend." He spoke a few hours after twenty thousand men and women members of Briton's forces had marched past the King and Queen in Hyde Park. British official circles emphasized the complete unanimity existing among the British, French and Polish governments that any attempt to disturb the status of Danzig, whether by inside coup or outside aggression, would be definitely

"resisted by force of arms." At Paris President Albert Lebrun Sunday issued a new warning against aggression as Premier Daladier conferred with General Maurice Gamelin who returned to Paris during the week end after inspecting French defences on the Italian frontier. Meanwhile, even before Gamelin reached Paris in answer to Daladier's urgent call, informed quarters said very little military steps, necessary for immediate action, up to the calling of the reservists, had been taken in the last few days.
