Following the Prime Minister's speech yesterday, several newsattacked the effectiveness of the explana In of the Norwegian campaign and advocated a more aggressive pursuit of the war. The Daily Mirror said the patience of the public with the government had dwindled to the disappearing point. The London News said Parliament would have the oppor tunity today to choose between inefficient failures and a real national government. The London Telegraph and the Manchester Guardian were also critical.

among some of the government's Farry, G. S. Barker, H. H. Hamilfollowing, it is not believed by political observers that it will be on such a scale as to make a Parliament defeat possible. The political strength of the National government in the House is 402 while there are 171 Laborites, inineteen Opposition Liberals and 21 other Oppositionists.

wards the Ministerial Bench. At other times, when the House was less crowded, Lansbury's bitterest! opponents would listen to him with a certain silent admiration. Lansbury was a curious mass of contradiction. The Commons of Westminster have ever been generous to one who is palpably sincere and courageous, and Lansbury, with all his precipitate waywardness, enjoyed a large measure of personal respect from politicians of every degree The King appreciated his character highly, and Lansbury for his part admitted his attitude in earlier life towards members of the Royal Family had been wrong. He had once declined a cigar from King Edward as Prince of Wales. "I have always felt ashamed of myself for not being courteous," confessed Lansbury many years later. Lansbury married Elizabeth Jane Brine and there were four sons and eight daughters, one of whom married Ernest Thurtle, Labor leftwinger.
