STATESMAN OF FINLAND

ened after its unsuccessful war with Japan.

A single chamber with representatives elected by equal, universal suffrage was the result, replacing the former system of estates, under which the nobles, the clergy, the townsmen and peasants were represented separately.

Between 1906 and 1917, he turned his attention to organizing a strong agrarian party, gradually winning more freedom of action and equal rights before the law with landlords and tenants.

Political Posts
His political posts included that of agricultural secretary in cabinets between 1917 and 1922. In the latter year he formed his own government. This cabinet lasted until 1925 when he became Minister of Communications. He was serving in his fourth cabinet when he was elected President in 1936 for a six years term. He held a parliamentary seat through all sessions from 1907 until his presidential term started.

A short, sturdy little man, barely five feet, with white pompadour hair, long "handle-bar" moustache and goatee, he looked much like a well-to-do American farmer who had retired in comfort. He was popular with all classes.

He always seemed to be smiling. He could speak foreign languages but rarely did so. In fact, he did not care much for lengthy speech of any sort.
