HEROES OF THE ORCHESTRA WHO NOW LIE FATHOMS DEEP

NAMES AND STORIES OF THE MEMBERS OF THE TITANIC'S STRING BAND WHOSE MEMORY WILL LIVE WHILE MUSIC THRILLS.

"What about the bandmen? Who were the people in the band?" These have been frequent queries following the Titanic disaster.

When the members of the orchestra of the Celtic went ashore their first question was about the musicians of the Titanic, whom many of them knew intimately.

"Not one of them saved?" said John S. Carr, cellist on the Celtic. "We knew most of them well. They were Englishmen, you know. Every one of them, I think. Nearly all the steamship companies hire their musicians abroad, and the men go from one ship to another often. The musicians of the Titanic were picked from a number of other White Star ships. Most of them had bunked with some of the Celtic players."

"The thing I can't realize is that Happy Jack Hume is dead," said Louis Cross, a player of the bass viol. "The merriest, happiest young Scotchman you ever saw. His family had been making musical instruments in Scotland for generations. I heard him say one time that they were minstrels in the olden days. Jack was to have been married when he returned to Scotland. He'd been on the sistership of the boat that went down when she was mixed up in the collision with the Hawke some months ago. It was the maiden trip of the Olympic."

He Liked the Sea.

"His old mother heard of it, and did her best to get him to give up his playing on steamers. Hume was a man of exceptional talent. He expected to go in for chamber music and regarded his work on the liners as a chance to advance his skill. But he liked the sea, and he made up his mind to finish his year with the Titanic."

"When he was bandmaster on the Carmania he played a little joke on a woman passenger. She'd given us a lot of trouble pretending that she knew a good deal about music. Once she asked us to play a particularly intricate classical piece."

"Jack whispered instructions, and at the close the woman came up and thanked him. But the piece we'd played was American ragtime, played slowly—and the woman didn't know the difference."

"Another cheery man was Fred Clark, bass viol, who was well known for his chamber work in Scotland. It was Clark's first voyage. When the White Star people looked up their music for the maiden voyage of the Titanic they were particularly anxious to have it of the very best. They offered Clark a large sum just for the single trip."

"Bandmaster Hartley was an ideal man for the position. He was of commanding stature and was 30 years old. He had been bandmaster on the Mauretania. He played the violin. "Bandmaster Hartley was an ideal man for the position. He was of commanding stature and was 30 years old. He had been bandmaster on the Mauretania. He played the violin."

Leader's Presence of Mind.

"Hartley was a splendid man for the emergency he had to meet. The hour when the iceberg was struck was so late that the men were probably retiring or having a last smoke before going to bed. On the Titanic there was a special smoking room for the musicians, and the cabins opened off of this, so I don't think that he had much trouble in getting his men together. He was a great believer in the power of music to prevent panic. I don't think he waited for orders."

There were five other musicians on the Titanic. Herbert Taylor was the pianist, a skilled musician, about forty years of age. His wife is an actress. The cellist was George Woodward, unmarried, of Leeds, Eng. The other three men were Bradley, Krins and Breicoux, who formed a trio which played in the second cabin and when the other men were off duty.

England Proud of the Band.

London, April 29.—The controller of the Titanic's musicians says that there were two bands aboard, the saloon orchestra of five men and the deck band, numbering three. Probably all were massed together under Hartley as the ship sank. Five were Englishmen, one a Scotchman, one a Frenchman and one a German.

Hartley was a Yorkshireman, aged 34, and well known and popular in musical circles in his country. He had composed several successful musical pieces and was to have been married shortly.
