Small ATS Group Does Vital Job

Twenty-Four Girls Assist Royal Corps of Signals in Secret Work

LONDON, Dec. 22.—There is a group of 24 Auxiliary Territorial Service girls who hear the latest war news even before the War Cabinet itself.

They work in a secret underground radio headquarters where they help the Royal Corps of Signals. Four of them were on duty when Rommel's rout began and they had to keep the secret before the Cabinet was told and the censors had decided on the release of the story.

The women have been doing the work for five months and through their headquarters passes all communications to and from the War Office to British troops at home and abroad. They work at chromium-edged control and switch panels.

They have to be constantly on their toes and accurate in everything they do.

"You see," one girl explained, "wave lengths are changed at various hours of the day to ensure secrecy and good reception and sending has to be timed to a second."
