

Enemy U-Boats In Coastal Waters New Challenge To Canadian Navy Warriors of Grim Atlantic Now Fight At Home As Well As Abroad

With the grim sea war brought to Canada's Atlantic doorway, the staunch men of the Canadian Navy have had to shoulder a new burden. Here an officer, speckled with frozen spray, is shown as he shouts above the gale through his megaphone.

The protection of convoys through the danger zones of the North have extended until they are only a few miles off Canada's shores. (Inset) Welcome break in the cold vigils on wind-swept decks comes Atlantic is a cold and hazardous job at best. But these danger zones thus the tense watch now begins from the moment the ships leave port. (Inset) when the cook dishes up steaming bowls of hot soup.

Watching the enemy's prowling U-boats are the keen men who sit at the listening posts of Canada's warships, constantly on the alert. Once a submarine is detected by these delicate devices, the corvettes and destroyers close in for the kill.

Terror of the Hun "Unterseeboote" is the depth charge, now carried by these ships. Until peace comes, no one will know how many submarines have been blasted to destruction by these charges. Here is one shown adjusted to explode at a predetermined depth near enemy U-boat.

Looking for trouble, a speedy little corvette races seaward, dark and service in clearing U-boats from Canada's coastal waters. Navy in this latitude at this season and suspect development of new "de-icing" apparatus to clear periscopes and hatches.

