Battle for the Solomon Islands . . .

Whether the Allied attack on the most easterly of the Japanese-occupied Solomon Islands proves a complete success or not, its motive is quite clear. It is a local operation, on a relatively small scale, designed primarily to push the enemy further from the American-Australian ocean routes. A secondary and almost equally valuable result would be to upset any plans the Japanese had made to encroach on or to invade Australia's northern coasts.

That the assault is the forerunner of a large-scale Allied attack in the southwest Pacific, aimed at recapturing all the islands taken by the enemy, is unlikely.

The forces available to General MacArthur are strong, but hardly large enough to undertake such a big

The task facing the Allies north and west of Australia is very different from that the Japanese fleet faced. They struck when they were ready and the United Nations were not. The Allies lacked sufficient air and sea Impressions of Woman Writer as power in that area, while the enemy had plenty of both. especially as he was able to concentrate swiftly for each new blow. Then the Allied strength was diffused in an effort to provide some, but always inadequate, protection for each island and peninsula.

The Solomon Islands battle will prove a helpful victory if the Japanese are driven from no more than the freighters, one behind the other easterly half of the chain. Recent sinkings of Allied ships, reported to the east of Australia suggested the enemy was making good use of his air and submarine bases in

They would gain little of present advantage even if they held the whole north shore of the island continent. But a realistic threat of invasion might pin down Allied forces in Australia, thus allowing the enemy to pursue more ambitious ventures elsewhere.

CHESTER, Eng., Aug. 14: (P)_ Only policemen "proceed" on their way; other people walk. At least, that is what Mr. Justice Singleton told a solicitor during a damage action hearing when the lawyer said his client was proceeding along the road. The judge said walking was a better word, and added "it is only policemen who
