Th wage ceiling will not be allowed to perpetuate existing inequalities in wage scales.

What impresses about the new steps is not that they are drastic. What impresses is that together they suggest that at last there is a plan. And, more important, that there will be centralized control over the distribution of manpower. The promise is that the Director of National Selective Service is at last to be given authority to direct. boys concerned present, we inves-His job is just beginning. It is a job that will require more compulsion than persuasion, not because the people are facts as stated in the resolution unwilling to back him up; not because they are unwilling to do anything and everything they know is necessary, had later obtained work did not, but because it is so late.

Distribution of our manpower has been confounded not only for want of plan, but for want of the elementary information on which to plan. The four months that the National Selective Service office has been in existence has been taken up collecting that information. It did not know until three weeks ago how many unemployed men there were in the country, and where they were.

This has meant more than delays in production, waste of trained manpower, haphazard industrial training. It hiring and firing of young people has meant the job of planning has been needlessly aggravated by excessive mobility and absenteeism. It has been aggravated, and will continue to be aggravated, by the voluntary enlistment system itself. Now there is to be real action by early orders-in-council.
