Invasion of Italy ...

Dramatically timed on the fourth anniversary of the declaration of war by Great Britain on Germany, the Allied landing on Italy proper is a development of great moment in the conflict. It is not exactly sensational or surprising, however, but may be accepted as a continuation of systematic Allied operations which must have as their final objective the heart and seat of Axis power. Possibly it is the most important phase so far of the Allied offensive in global warfare.

Certainly all indications and all activities of late, including the recent aerial pounding of Italy's communication lines, pointed to the new move which came 300 rt today.

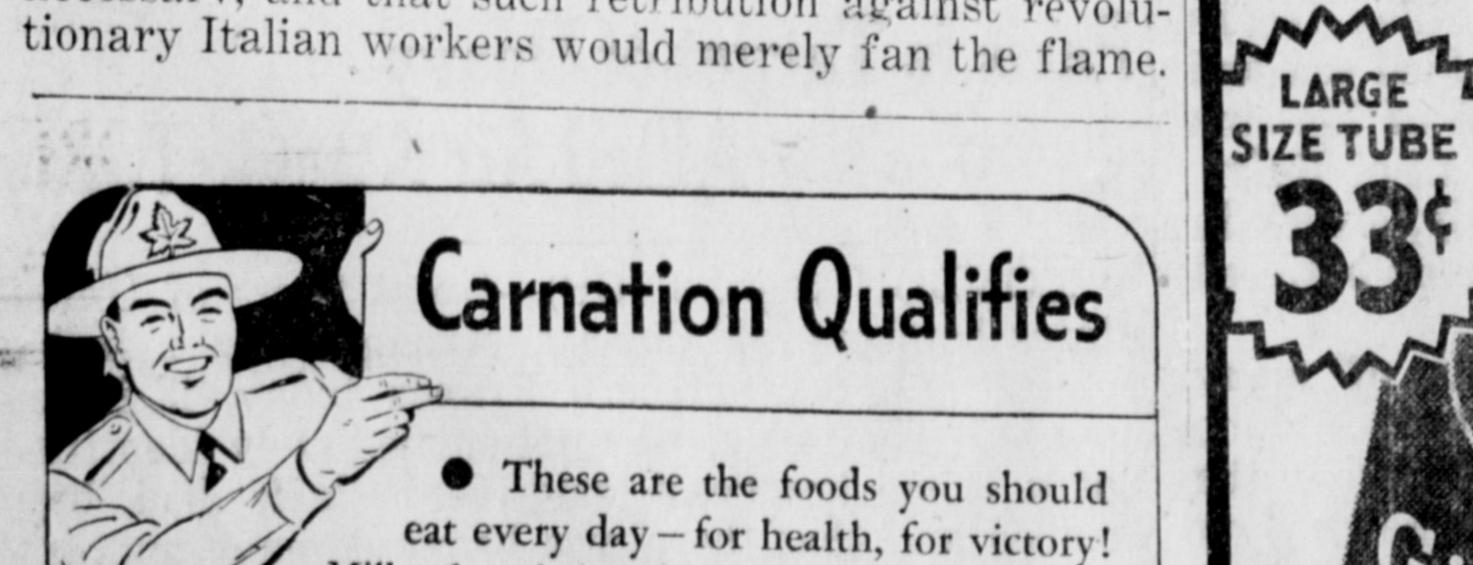

The second front has been opened in real earnest now. The war is increasing in scope and intensity. The tempo is quickening. We are getting the action which we so long have anticipated, yes hoped for because it must be faced some time.

Canadians are in the thick of it now and we must be prepared to take the bad news with the good.

It plete disintegration of the old administration in most which Louise expressed her parts of Italy is likely, and our troops may for the first time enter areas where the native population has already freed itself from the Fascist overlords and taken over the local government. In a military sense the German armies stationed in north Italy can establish a strong defence along the Po River, although the supply lines would be tortuous and vulnerable. More than military considerations, however, may move the German generals upon whom the task of defending Northern Italy would fall. Even German troops will be demoralized by the anti-Nazi, anti-Fascist, anti-war sympathies of the Italian population. Italian workers revolting under internationalist Socialist banners do not constitute a movement calculated to revive the fighting spirit of a war-weary army dependent on a war-weary population. German generals can probably see already that enforcement of ruthless discipline against an actively recalcitrant Italian population would be necessary, and that such retribution against revolu-
