Civic Matters Are Discussed

Housewives' League in Regular Session on Tuesday Night—Organization Expanding.

Civic matters were discussed at a meeting of the east-end Housewives' League Tuesday night and resolutions were passed for submission to the Civic Labor Federation to which organization delegates were appointed in the persons of Mrs. William Creak, Mrs. J. Bouvette and Mrs. J. R. Blakey.

Attention was drawn to the fact that quite a few children in the east-end were unable to attend school owing to lack of accommodation and emphasis was placed on the need of immediate action in connection with the building of the new school on Conrad Street which Wartime Housing has decided to erect.

Exception was taken to juveniles being able to go into local stores and purchase cigarettes and steps will be taken to see that this is checked.

A second Housewives' League is being organized in the west-end of the city. On its formation, a central executive will be formed with delegates from each branch.

There was a report on a whist drive held October 1 when the sum of $19.80 was realized.

Last night's meeting was well attended and a few new members were enrolled. Mrs. J. R. Blakey was in the chair.

Save Planes For Defence Of Germany

Allied Air Forces Drive Germans To Defence Tactics.

By ALAN RANDAL
Canadian Press Staff Writer
LONDON, Oct. 14 — You don't have to go any further than the men who man the big night bombers to get the answer to the question of what has become of the German air force. The bomber men say the German air force has been turned almost entirely to defence, particularly in increasing use of night fighters.

In all probability there are some hundreds more night fighters between Britain and Berlin than at any other time in the past couple of years.

Men and planes never intended for use as defensive fighters and machines not designed for night interception, now are being used by the Germans for this work in the hope of forcing the Royal Air Force to abandon night raids in great strength.

At the same time, while continuing the strategic bombing of German target cities the Allied air forces—British and United States—are concentrating on thinning the ranks of the German fighter force. One of the potent weapons for this work is the use of the fragmentation bomb.

This bomb has been found particularly useful in the Tunisian and Sicilian campaigns to immobilize enemy aircraft. Before the Allies invaded Sicily it was estimated the Germans had between 250 and 300 fighter planes in the Catania area. Then the Allied air arm went to work on the enemy airfields and by the time the landings were made only 20 to 30 of these aircraft were serviceable.

After Nazi Planes

In recent weeks the aerial offensive in the west has been directed at airfields, particularly the 20 or so which form an arc between Holland and Brest.

Britain proved during the battle of Britain, when the enemy was attacking British airfields in the south of England, that it does no great harm to bomb airfields with ordinary bombs because the damage can be quickly repaired. The present offensive against enemy airfields is of different design.

The fragmentation bomb is directed not at the airfields but at the dispersed aircraft. The bomb is light in weight. Hundreds can be carried by a single aircraft and when a force sweeps over an airfield thousands of them are released. They do not make holes in the ground but explode instantaneously on contact with the ground and split into hundreds of flying fragments.

So far there has been no claim that these fragments destroy an aircraft but there has been sufficient evidence in Tunisia and Sicily to prove that an aircraft can be seriously damaged, or even destroyed.

This then, is an attack which is complementary to the destruction of enemy fighters in the air. The intruder air attacks and sweeps over the continent by the fighter aircraft still go on but when the German air force refuses to come up and fight it must be destroyed on the ground and the fragmentation bombing is aimed at this.
