Untaught Fiddler Makes His Living

VANCOUVER, March 11 (C)—In Klondike parka, stocking cap and sweeping gray beard, you'll see him any day on Vancouver streets—sitting on a camp stool, fiddling for his supper.

Matt Nystrom waited until he was 60 before he bought his first fiddle for $2, because he read in a Swedish newspaper that musicians reach their peak at that age. He can't read music, he has never studied any of the great masters. He plays the violin for a living because he injured his back while working the woods.

"When you hurt the back," he explained in cadenced Swedish accents. "You must use the brain. I cannot work hard, I was hungry. I knew I had to eat, so I got a fiddle and now I make my own way." From his initial investment Matt stepped into the higher brackets. Now he whips out "Pretty Red Wing" on an instrument for which he paid $35 and which he insists is worth $100. But Matt realizes his musical shortcomings. He's going to enroll for a series of violin lessons. "I will learn and learn," he promises himself, "and, who knows, one day the world will listen to Matt Nystrom."
