New Modern School Building In Vicinity of McBride St.

Plan of Former Inspector

From the school records in the City Hall Mrs. J. A. Rutherford, secretary of the board of school trustees, has just dug up a hitherto unpublished survey of the local school accommodation situation which was made by Alex Turnbull, former school inspector here, who left the city for another inspectorate last summer. It is an interesting document which, among other things, found that all the present elementary school buildings in Prince Rupert had just about come to a state structurally where they would have to be replaced before long by new ones.

Every railway and highway leading to Rostov is now in Russian hands and the Red Army is only 38 miles from the city. Further gains on the approaches to Rostov were made last night.

Mr. Turnbull recommended that Booth Memorial School be converted from high to elementary school purposes and that a new eighteen-room school for senior and junior high school purposes be built in the vicinity of McBride Street, possibly embodying the features of a civic centre. Mr. Turnbull's report further suggests that King Edward School grounds be made a public playing field and that Borden Street School be rebuilt at a site slightly further west than at present. Even Mr. Turnbull at that time suggested that Wartime Housing might provide a subsidy for school building purposes.

As a temporary expedient, Mr. Turnbull suggested that one or two room schools might be built to provide accommodation for increasing school population.

Meanwhile, the board of school trustees is continuing to give serious consideration to the problem of expanding school population, projects suggested including a six room school at Seal Cove, six rooms at Conrad Street, an eight room school in the vicinity of Corad Street with the abolition of Seal Cove school or a ten room school in the present site of King Edward school with the replacement of the latter after the war.
