CANADA'S PEACE PART

DRIME Minister Mackenzie King, I in the course of presenting Canada's case at the Paris peace conference where he made the very useful suggestion that Big Four foreign ministers might consider new proposals arising out of the conference while the parley was in progress rather than waiting until it is over, complained in the usual diplomatic and gentle King manner that Canada felt she was not being allowed a measure of participation in peace negotiations compatible with the great part she played in

Mr. King was, apparently, in typically statesmanlike and tactful form in his utterance at the conference. He is not given to ill considered or violent complaints but, when he does complain, it may be assumed by all and sundry that the complaint is justifiable and has not been made without full and careful consideration.

The people of Canada will be be-Mr. King to a man when he saggests that Canada, which played such a big part in winning the war, feels, in view of her effort, that she might be permitted to play a little larger part in framing the peace. In the doing of this statesmen of the calibre and ability of Mr. King have talents which could well be used. Of course, he would be too modest himself to make, or possibly even think, of such a suggestion.

Men learn to talk in a few months. Then spend the rest of their lives learning to keep still.

FUTILITY OF STRIKE

THE FUTILITY of the strike has I once more been cogently demonstrated. Eight hundred foundry workers in Vancouver returned to work today after seventy-seven days of idleness following their walk-out. As for the dispute, it is still, as it was the day the strike started, pending the outcome of negotiation. Work could have been going on just as well as not while the negotiation was in progress. The only thing the strike may have been instrumental in accomplishing was speeding up the settlement. Even that is a hypothetical assumption. What the strike did do, however, was deprive 800 men of their regular pay for 77 days, upset the production and organization of the operators and deprive the consuming public of badly needed goods and services. The least loss probably was that suffered by the operators themselves. Much more serious was the loss of the strikers. The consuming public, as usual, was indifferently left to suffer disappointment and inconvenience.

If you want people to think you're wise, talk to 'em in language they can't understand.

COMMUNITY SERVICE

NE of the big problems in com-U munity service today is the one of bringing the business and professional men of the community to the realization that their town is a business and that as citizens they have a responsibility to keep that town in business. Any business that does not keep pace with the progress of its particular industry and allied lines is not going to stay in business very long. So it is with every town. Problems of many kinds are confronting all towns today, and someone-some individual or some organizationmust give the time and the energy to meet these problems and attempt to solve them for the best interests of the community, or that community is not going to stay in business.
