Juvenile Delinquency

To regard the present unhappy trend of youthful crime as purely a juvenile problem is to ignore the true situation, says the Salvation Army Red Shield report. Juvenile delinquency is merely the outcroppings of general lower moral standards in the places where the resistance and control is less rigid-i.e., among the immature elements of society.

Blaming juvenile delinquency on the shortage of proper housing and on the lack of play-ground supervision, on economic conditions and on the advanced (?) intelligence or smartness of the present crop of juveniles is just the evidence of the superficial thinking and moral astigmatism for which many of the problem-solvers of the present day are notorious.

Juvenile delinquency is not a trouble which had developed independently of the fundamental problems of our times. It is a symptom of the low standard of morals existent.

To cure it we must improve the home life, clean up the radio, films and literature. We must teach and practice the principles of true religion and moral ethics for the purpose of presenting to the youth of the nation, a positive antidote to the evil now being much more persistently and persistently and perseveringly taught by so many evil agencies.

True, recreation and clean entertainment will help. Good housing and attractive environment, fine schools, excellent opportunities and intelligent vocational training will all assist in developing a fine clean generation of young Canadians, but there are the lesser essentials.

The primary essentials are:

(1) A home in which a child receives training in the principles of religion, where these principles are lived every day, and where moral principles are never violated.

(2) Parents with a deep moral understanding, who take time to explain and with kindness enforce their code from the earliest years.

(3) A recognition of, and membership in, the Christian Church that the principles taught in the home can be confirmed and cultivated all through the formative years.

Will there be no delinquency where these standards exist? Yes! Sometimes, evil influences from outside, so prevalent in the society will cause lapses even in such conditions, but they will be few and far between.

"Train up a child in the way he should go and when he is old he will not depart from it."

What can we expect, when evil propensities are often fed by "best sellers" - positively unclean, by movies educating in and glorifying crime, by radio which minimizes and familiarizes the family circle with the ghastly details of murder, condones immorality and adultery, jests about the moral delinquency of adults, and learned psychiatrists who make wrong-doing easy by arguing against and undermining the dictates of conscience?

Royal Visit to South Africa

The announcement that King George VI, Queen Elizabeth and Princesses Elizabeth and Margaret have accepted General Smuts' suggestion that they should visit South Africa early next year has been welcomed is a fresh expression of the essential unity of the nations forming the British Commonwealth.

Never was there a time when the peoples of the Empire were more conscious of their common destiny. This first Royal visit to the youngest of the Dominions expresses for the people of Britain the deep sense of unity they feel with their kinsmen overseas.

Now that the self-governing Dominions have the status of equality with the Mother Country the person of the King is the only tangible bond between them. The very fact that the Royal Family are united on South African soil will symbolise more clearly than ever the fact that the King is the King of every one of His Dominions in no other sense than he is King of England.
