Prince Rupert and Alaska

Urging federal action to provide better shipping service for Alaska at more reasonable rates and appealing for a removal of the grip which the port of Seattle holds on the territory of Alaska by means of which Seattle supplies and Seattle industries are unduly protected in selling the Alaska market, the Ketchikan Alaska Chronicle has just presented a special thirty-two page edition of protest against the proposed doubling of ocean freight rates. The edition has been timed as a prelude to a hearing of the United States Maritime Commission on transportation problems affecting Alaska which is scheduled to open in Washington on May 22 following a recent survey conducted by the Commission. It is being circulated among all members of United States Congress and in other influential quarters.

The possibility of taking advantage of Prince Rupert's strategically importance in relation to Alaska in order to provide more efficient transportation service for the territory is stressed strongly by the Chronicle which, among other suggestions for the easing of Alaska's transportation difficulties, makes the following which is of direct interest to Prince Rupert:

"We favor also appointment of a joint Canadian-American committee to handle peacetime problems of northwest America as the joint defense board handled defence matters. It could internationalize transportation, perhaps waive customs and immigration red tape in Alaska, Yukon Territory and northern British Columbia, and co-ordinate various agricultural, mining and industrial development matters. For instance, if Skeena River farmers can ship us eggs and butter more cheaply than Seattle, why shouldn't they do so, and help develop the Skeena?"

If the United States government cannot help to effect various changes which are proposed to provide relief for shipping and remove the territory from the shackles of Seattle interests, the Chronicle goes on to say:

"We think Alaska's answer is clearto hook up with the railhead at Prince Rupert to move its goods via Canadian National Railways. Repeal of the Jones Act might be justified; if Canada opens the Alcan Highway to U.S. travel, we certainly could open our waterways to Canadian ships for freight and passenger use."

The editor of the Prince Rupert Daily News was invited to make a feature contribution to the special edition of the Chronicle dealing with the relation of this port to Alaska and this is what he wrote for full page presentation:

"When war in the Pacific after the attack on Pearl Harbor brought direct threat of invasion of the American mainland by way of Alaska, the United States was quick to implement the strategic importance of the port of Prince Rupert in relation to Alaska and to use it as a vital transportation stepping stone, first in effecting its defenses and later in carrying the war to the enemy.

"Now that war is over and development and rehabilitation of northwest America in relation to the opening up of vast resources of the northland are an important factor in the immediate future of the Pacific arena, Prince Rupert, so well equipped as a transcontinental railway terminal and fully developed port with all the necessary facilities for handling huge tonnages of traffic, looks northward to Alaska as a neighbor which it is both ready and anxious to serve.

"A scant 100 miles removed, Prince Rupert has for many years drawn in a limited way upon Alaska's first port of Ketchikan for fish and other commodities destined to the United States by the most rapid means of transit possible.

"The Canadian National Railway line, running eastward from Prince Rupert, has proven of invaluable service in this regard to Southeastern Alaska. The natural flow of the Alaska traffic by this route has been greatly hampered, however, by measures expressly designated to divert it to Seattle and over the American railway lines, namely the Jones

"Notwithstanding all this, however, Prince Rupert looks forward to the day when such restrictions will be permanently removed and Alaska and Prince Rupert will be able to enjoy the interchange of relationships, facilities for which have existed so long and which were more perfected during the emergency of war when it became essential that they should be taken full advan-

"Even now Prince Rupert is engaged in a campaign for a government-subsiocean steamship service which would fit in nicely with movement through the port of Alaskan canned salmon which, before the war, sold freely in the United Kingdom.

"Given direct service to the United Kingdom with the same rates as those quoted from Vancouver and Seattle, vessels from Prince Rupert, it is anticipated, would attract a substantial part of the pack of Southeastern Alaska. In addition to the canned salmon trade, there could also be developed the movement of Alaskan frozen fish by the use of refrigerated vessels.

"In addition to seeking the cooperation of Southeastern Alaska interests to assist its development by requesting them to work for the abolition of the offensive Jones bill, Prince Rupert recently launched another move which might further improve its claim to draw Alaskan traffic.

"That is presentation of its claim to be established as a free port which, if done, would internationalize its port facilities and eliminate much of the formality otherwise involved in the movement of traffic, even in bond. That application for establishment as a free port is now being considered.

"Prince Rupert has also been making representations for over a year with a view to further encouraging tourist traffic to Alaska through the port by the establishment of an automobile ferry service between the terminus at Prince Rupert of the war-built transcontinental highway and the Haines cut-off to the Alaska Highway—a service which would have such points as Ketchikan, Petersburg, Wrangell and Juneau as way ports.

"Possibly no more tangible expression of interest in the relationship of Prince Rupert and Southeastern Alaska and the possibility of development of business and traffic between them could have been manifested than the gesture of a little more than a year ago when the Prince Rupert Chamber of Commerce sent a goodwill mission of several of its younger and more active members on a personal expedition to Ketchikan, Juneau, Wrangell, Haines, Petersburg and Skag-

"The contacts and discussion of that mission inspired these Prince Rupert men to a concrete realization of the possibilities that existed for Prince Rupert in relationship to Southeastern Alaska.

"Alaska, in its campaign against proposed freight rate increases, may be disposed to sympathetically consider the alternative and permanent possibilities which Prince Rupert has to offer."

A decrease in the number of unemployed in the district was reported at the regular meeting of the local employment committee at the week-end with J. S. Wilson, chairman, presiding, and J. C. Gilker, Alderman R. McKay, A. Wallin, James Nicol, E. V. Whiting, local manager, and R. Whiffin of the Unemployment Insurance Commission present. Vacancies at Dawson Creek were reported.

Correspondence was read regarding the apprenticeship situation. The need for skilled men in the building industry was very marked but there was the unfortunate situation that many youths were not willing to undergo the required training period for apprentices to enable them to become journeymen. This shortsighted attitude on the part of the young men was very regrettable.

PROTEST PRICES CONTROL POLICY

L.P.P. to Take Up Matter With City Council

Sharp issue was taken with the government's price control policy at a meeting at the weekend of the Prince Rupert Labor-Progressive Council.

The delegates, meeting under the chairmanship of Mrs. J. R. Blakey, recalled representations made in February to Minister of Finance J.
