VANCOUVER ARTISTS SPUR MODERN HOME DESIGN

"Homes-not just houses!" is the cry of Vancouver's "Art In Living" group of artists, looking forward to the estimated 500,000 Canadian homes to be built in the next five years. The Group, made up of students, graduates and teachers from Vancouver School of Arts, believe this can be accomplished through six basic elements of design: light, view, space, shape, color and surface. Drawings for community centres have been studied by Group leader Fred Amess and secretary Jean Cooper (upper left) on vacant land in suburban Vancouver. Group is now busy with its Autumn architectural display, a work which won such popularity when first exhibited in the Vancouver Art Gallery that it is now an annual event. From miniatures built in basement workshops Jack Newman (centre) aided by Ron Hamilton and Joyce Butler designs additions to own home. Below, Bert Binning's bright, airy home, built at cost of only $5,000, combining all six architectural elements stressed by Group, is one of Canada's most discussed examples of modern housing.
