Liberalism or Canadianism..

T WAS A TIMELY RESTATEMENT of Liberal party principles that Prime Minister W. L. Mackenzie King made last night in a national network radio broadcast. It also rang with high princciples of true Canadianism as the Prime Minister called for national unity instead of provincial or local sectionalism. When he said that the Liberal party stood for principles of unity, security and freedom, not only nationally but internationally, and warned against the disastrous consequences of a multiciplicity of political divisions within a nation, he was preaching good Canadianism and there are few who would venture to say that Mr. King is not a true and good Canadian first and foremost.

There is nothing more timely and reasonable than the exhortation which Mr. King made that those who are like-minded on general principles should combine under one banner and proceed as one instead of becoming divided in less important shades of opinion. In multiplicity of parties lay great danger, said Mr. King, citing the world's most tragic illustration in France. One wonders if Mr. King might, by any chance, have had the thought that, while he was advancing the cause of Liberalism as a party, it might be necessary to combine even more broadly along party lines to maintain unity, security and freedom. Quite possibly he might picture such changes as being possible within the compass of true Liberalism which has always boasted its capability of generous interpretation and elasticity.

Not All Strikes

MARELL-OILED publicity machines of the labor leaders never let the public miss hearing about those cases where they have "forced" management to give higher wages and better working contions; how union "demands" have successfully "wrung new concessions from the bosses."

What very seldom gets into the news are those thousands upon thousands of cases where management has taken the iniative in bettering the position of its employees.

Some strikes we have had. But it should be remembered that only a very small proportion of the working population was tangled in this form of warfare. The vast majority of employees have continued to get along well with their employers with increasing rewards.
