He was appointed leader of the Conservative party at the Sherbrooke convention of 1933, succeeding Camillien Houde who had been defeated in the two constituencies in which he ran at the 1931 general elections.

As leader of the opposition in the assembly, he was the first in that capacity to be cheered by the galleries during debate since the Taschereau regime's inception in 1920. He kept up an incessant fire against the government benches and when the 1935 elections came he was joined by a group of dissident young Liberals—the Action Liberal Nationale-headed by Paul Gouin, son of the later Premier Sir Lomer Gouin.

The combination cut Premier Taschereau's majority from 66 to six, and the Taschereau ministry resigned June 10, 1936.
