Military Reorganization . . .

Influenced no doubt by the exigencies and repercussions of the new general policy of conscription and with a with Germany and Italy. which occupied the centre of the limelight at the first of this week.

The present set-up of military defences on this coast is a hangover from the plan which was adopted when the Japanese were on the Aleutian Islands and presented a definite invasion threat to the whole Pacific Coast. Now that the danger of a Japanese invasion is practically out of the picture, it is logical that the trained forces should be removed from these areas and taken to where they are worse needed in bringing the war to its victorious culmination as speedily as possible.

With things settling down following the recent crisis resulting from the abrupt decision to go conscription, it is to be expected that there will be little delay in concentrating on the steps necessary to bring about the most efficacious war effort under the conditions presently prevailing.

Of course, Prince Rupert will continue to play an important part in war strategy one way or another as long as we have to wage the conflict against the enemy across the Pacific Ocean.
