DARING WORK—

AERIAL SNAPSHOTS HELP PROVIDE VITAL INFORMATION FOR ARMIES

One of the important elements of modern war is aerial reconnaissance and one of the biggest jobs of the arm of the air force is photography. The methods used today are a far cry from the last war when Royal Air Corps planes, often called "crates" tied togetehr by string and chewing gum," made shaky observation flights over enemy territory.

In the early days of this war reconnaissance photography was carried out by comparatively slow peacetime planes and many of these aircraft failed to return to the home base. To cut down on such losses, a number of the fastest aircraft were turned over for reconnaissance duty. Spitfires were stripped of their armament to increase their speed, fitted with larger gasoline tanks to increase their range, and equipped with automatic cameras.

Before the take-off, a technician adjusts the camera, setting the speed, the lens opening and the time between pictures. The Spitfire pilot proceeds to the section of enemy territory assigned to him, starts the mechanism of the camera by pushing a button on the dashboard. He cruises back and forth over the target until it is all covered, or until the enemy fighters come up to intercept him. Although he is unarmed, the greater height and speed at which he flies makes it possible for him to escape.

Since the first Spitfires soared over their photographic targets, many improvements have been made. The provisions of lenses with larger apertures than ever before, camera mountings designed to reduce the effects of the plane's vibrations, a continuous film developer for all size of film up to nine inches wide are a few of the advantages. Research has also been done in the field of flash photography, using delayed action flash bombs.

With the introduction of night bombing, night photography has become a vital necessity. Bomber Command must know whether or not the pilot has hit his target. In night photography, the target is lighted by a flash bomb, timed to go off at a certain height. The glare of the flash falls on a photo-electric cell in the bottom of the aircraft which starts the mechanism of the camera, causing the lens to open.

A number of these improvements in aerial photography have been contributed by Canadian research workers at the National Research Council in Ottawa. Working in close collaboration with the Unied States and Great Britain, Canada has contributed to the advances in the field of photography.

Music Seen and Heard in Movie Starring Skelton

Music is both seen and heard in the Friday and Saturday film offering of "Bathing Beauty" at the Capitol Theatre.

The tune-spangled M. G. M. technicolor comedy starring Red Skelton and Esther Williams, champion swimming beauty, introduces visual music with Harry James and his band furnishing melodies for an elaborate water ballet sequence. Miss Williams is supported by 32 bathing beauties.

As the rhythm of the music changes from sweet to hot, lighting effects within the swimming pool itself change color to harmonize with the mood of the melodies. Music for the picture is also supplied by Xavier Cugat and his Latin American band.

Skelton is at his best in this vehicle and he is ably abetted by the beautiful Miss Williams. The comedian takes the role of a song writer who forgets about his songs when he meets Miss Williams.

It's a fun and melody show that everyone will enjoy.

SPORT FLASHBACKS

By the Canadian Press

Remember when:

Bobby Pearce sculled his way into the limelight 16 years ago with an easy victory over Ken Myers of the United States in the Olympic final at Amsterdam. After cleaning up on the world's amateurs, the Australian turned pro in 1933. He won two Olympic titles and the Diamond Sculls before turning pro.
